Catie is a trial lawyer who represents businesses, public entities, and professionals in complex business litigation, employment, and insurance defense cases. She litigates cases in state and federal courts, including the Idaho and U.S. Supreme Courts. She also assists employers in actions before the Idaho Human Rights Commission (IHRC) and U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC). In addition, Catie aids attorneys in defending themselves against potential professional disciplinary actions with the Idaho State Bar. She has extensive pleading practice and has filed over 20 dispositive motions, including both motions to dismiss and motions for summary judgment (MSJ), and through the filing of these dispositive motions she was able to successfully resolve a number of cases in her clients' favor, so they avoided trial altogether.

Catie previously worked as in house counsel at a local governmental entity where she represented elected officials and their employees in employment, professional liability, tort, appeals, and other cases. In this role, she served as lead counsel on employment law matters, directed internal employment investigations and defended employment litigation, including whistleblower claims. Catie's first-hand public service experience makes her uniquely qualified to defend public entities. Her appellate experience includes arguing for equal immunities between prosecutors and public defenders before the Idaho Supreme Court. In another case, Catie successfully appealed her client's trial loss in a civil forfeiture case. The appeal resulted in a win for her clients and new law that benefited her clients in future civil forfeiture cases.

Catie is engaged in Idaho's legal community and has devoted many volunteer hours to enhancing Idaho's legal system and legal profession. She participates in a number of discussions with law students and new lawyers each year regarding lawyers' ethical obligations to their clients.
